

Nepal is a landlocked country located in South Asia, bordered by China to the north and India to the south, east, and west. It is known for its diverse geography, including the Himalayas, which contain eight of the world's ten highest peaks, including Mount Everest, the highest point on Earth. Nepal is also culturally rich, with a blend of Hinduism and Buddhism influencing its traditions, festivals, and way of life.

As of my last update in January 2022, Nepal's gross domestic product (GDP) has been steadily growing, albeit at a moderate pace. Agriculture, tourism, and remittances from Nepali workers abroad are significant contributors to the country's economy. However, Nepal faces various challenges, including political instability, infrastructure deficiencies, and geographical barriers that hinder economic development.

Nepal's GDP growth rate has been around 6-7% in recent years, with the service sector contributing the most to the economy, followed by agriculture and industry. However, it's important to note that Nepal is still one of the least developed countries in the world, and its GDP per capita remains relatively low compared to global standards.

For the most up-to-date information on Nepal's GDP and economic status, I recommend consulting recent reports from sources such as the World Bank, International Monetary Fund (IMF), or Nepal's Central Bureau of Statistics.
